CHAPTER III MARY-ANN Mv youthful studies have developed in me at least one passion that has absorbed all otherscuriosity. Until the day I set out for Athens my greatest glory in life was to learn; and my greatest sorrow to be obliged to acknowledge myself an ignoramus. I loved science as a man does his mistress, and hitherto nothing had disputed her place in my heart. On the other hand, I had but little sensibility, and sentiment rarely troubled me. I went about the world with a magnifyingglass, as though the said world were a colossal museum. The pleasures and sufferings of others seemed to me worthy of study, but unworthy either of envy or pity. I could no more feel jealous of a happy married couple than of a pair of palm-trees growing side by side; and I had just as much compassion for a broken heart as for a geranium shrivelled by the frost. One is not easily shocked if one ever has vivisected a rat, and I frankly own that I should have thoroughly enjoyed a combat of gladiators. The love of Photini for John Harris would have excited pity in any one else but a naturalist. To use Henri IV s expression, the poor creature loved at random, and it was pretty evident that her love never would be requited. She was too timid to express it; John, too careless to divine its existence. Even if he had suspected...
