S. producers could be competitive even in our weakest industries or, at a different configuration of exchange rates, not competitive even in our strongest. Second, the most fundamental economic concept of international trade - Ricardos principle of comparative advantage - dictates that a country will export the goods and services in which it is relatively competitive, and import the goods and services in which it is not - even if it is extremely efficient at producing goods and services in the latter category. By definition, a country cannot have a comparative advantage in producing everything, and thus it cannot have a uniform cost advantage. Thus, a comparison of domestic and foreign costs, though perhaps intuitively appealing, is not a useful measure of competitiveness. A better approach to measuring competitiveness relies on a comparison of produc-tivity, the amount of goods and services produced per worker hour. Higher produc-tivity means a higher attainable standard of living, for over the long term a society cannot consume more than it produces. Our objective, as a society, should be a high and rising standard of living. International trade is only a means to achieving this ultimate objective; strong exports or a trade surplus are not ends in themselves. The Determinants of Productivity Productivity per worker hour depends on a range of factors, many of which are influenced by taxation. We should consider the impact of taxation on human capital, tangible capital, and intangible capital...
