The variability in the mean daily hydrograph levels, which had diminished during the summer drawdown, returned in late September. In October 1971 the hydrographs of Devils Hole and well 17S/50-36dd resumed slow and parallel declines. It became evident that the cessation of pumping for wells 4, 5, and 6 had produced only about 0.2 ft (6 cm) of recovery in Devils Hole and that continued pumping of wells 1, 2, or 3 was lowering the water level. The recorder in Devils Hole malfunctioned in midDecember 1971, but the recorder in well 17S/50-36dd continued to operate. On December 20, wells 2 and 3 were shut down, and a slow recovery of the water level began in the observation well. In January 1972, well 1 stopped pumping, and the recovery in well 17S/50-36dd increased in rate. Analysis of the data collected through January 1972 showed that wells 7, 8, and 13 had no detectable effect on the water level in Devils Hole; wells 1, 4, and 5 had significant effects; and either well 2 or well 3, or both, had a measurable effect. No direct hydraulic data pertinent to the effect of well 6 had been obtained before it was abandoned. However, reduction of the discharge records of Crystal Pool during the late summer of 1971 show that about 90 percent of the well 6 discharge was compensated by reduction of the flow of Crystal Pool. Because observation well 17S/50-36dd did not respond as clearly to pumping...
