Excerpt: . . . unheard-of madness transported him. But the generous lion, 0 more civil than arrogantaking no notice of his vapouring and bravadoespafter having stared about him, as has been said, turned his back, and shewed his posteriors to DonVixote, and, with great phlegm and calmness, laid himself down again in the cage. Which Don (Luixote perceiving, he ordered the keeper to give him some blows, and provoke him to come forth. That I will not do, answered the keeper; for, should I provoke him, I myself shall be the first he will tear in pieces. Be satisfied, signor cavalier, with what is done, which is all that can be said in point of courage, and do not tempt fortune a second time. The lion has the door open, and it is in his choice to come forth or not: and since he has not yet come out, he will not come out all this day. The greatness of your worships con. rage is already sufficiently shewn: no brave com. batant, as take it, is obliged to more than to chal. lenge his foe, and expect him in the field; and, if the antagonist does not meet him, the infamy lies at his door, and the cexpectant gairts the crown of Vo-L. III. H conqncstflf zonquest. V That is true, answeredDon Quixote: shut the door, friend, and give me a certisicate, in the best form you can, ofwhat you have seen me do here. It is fit...
